

Jury Surveys

A recent phenomenon of online polling to measure public opinion of actual (supposed), criminal cases has become evident. In a recent experience as a general survey-taker, I have seen such a survey and it presented a large amount of text which, if based on a real case, would have been wildly illegal, expository, and in the example I saw of a wrongful termination lawsuit, no form was presented prior to the survey taker proving that they'd read and absorbed the dozens of pages of nonsense preceding input. Specifically for the case I began to survey, a woman was allegedly fired following a period of bereavement for her mother who'd committed suicide. Her suit claimed wrongful termination under the circumstances, and unfortunately there was no place to type in my response to the case.

Hypothetically, if all the details described in the survey were real, it is noteworthy that both the plaintiff and the defendant are/were due massive restitution by the US Federal government which continually denies citizens a chance to vote for subsidized, essential needs for individuals and businesses. Such subsidies, inexplicably missing from all ballots, would have made the plaintiff's employment categorically voluntary, whereas under the existing economic system, it wasn't. As a forced service, the plaintiff was owed for damages, both mental and physical while indentured therein, but no less than the other employees of the business.

In conclusion, denial of review, real input and opportunities for reform of the Western Economic systems, make criminals out of the government and elected representatives whose jobs are to observe and execute the will of the people.

- whitehot robot